China and Japan edge closer to war

France's military gamble in Mali

Is the euro zone out of danger?

How children succeed

Aaron Swartz, data liberator

How will history see me?

On the cover
If this president wants history to give him a good write-up, he should concentrate on three long-term problems: leader, page 9. Barack Obama's first-term caution was understandable, but he must now show greater resolve, pages 26-28. Israel-Palestine is a good example: leader, page 10. Some ambitious ideas on gun control, page 30, and on immigration reform: Lexington, page 34

China and Japan The risks of a clash between these two powers are rising—and the consequences for the region could be calamitous: leader, page 12. Armed conflict over trivial specks in the East China Sea looms closer, page 43

Pakistan The army should be stopped if it tries to intervene: leader, page 14. The country's civilian leaders fight back after a battering by a populist cleric, courts and, behind it all, the army, page 41. A beleaguered group makes an unusual but powerful gesture, page 42

Outsourcing and offshoring

The dispatching of jobs to faraway places is on the wane: leader, page 11. After decades of sending work across the world, companies are rethinking their offshoring strategies, says Tamzin Booth. See our special report after page 48

The euro Government-bond markets in peripheral Europe are soaring, but the euro crisis is not over, page 69. Two books on Britain and Europe, page 82

How children succeed Solid measures of educational achievement are elusive—but politicians love them, page 61. According to a new book, character is more important than intelligence in determining children's academic success, page 81
